The Bad Word Box

Mike never signed the notes, but it soon became evident that all of them were from him. He 1.vehemently denied writing or passing out these notes. As a teacher, I had several choices. I could put him in 2. ______. I could send him to the office. I could 3.reprimand him each time a note was discovered. Or, I could take an approach that allowed Mike to express his feelings in the only way he knew how but without offending any of his classmates. He was already slowly 4.alienating the few friends he had left in the classroom.

One day after yet another 5.nasty note was brought to my attention, I asked Mike to come up to my desk. I sat him on my lap and held him tight. At first he struggled, and I just held him closer, speaking very softly to him about what a neat little boy I thought he was and 6. ______ it seemed to me that he was really worried about something. Does he want to tell me what it was? His 7. _____ turned into struggling and then fighting with all his might to free himself from my arms.

Having learned a little bit about holding techniques in my graduate studies, I decided this was a case 8. _____ perhaps I should hold Mike through his anger. So I held on gently but tight. After several minutes, he did stop fighting and begin sobbing, nuzzling himself into my arms like a new puppy who wants to be held and loved. He never did tell me what was bothering him, but he did admit to send the notes.

The next day I gave Mike a box with a silt cut in the top. I told him it was Mike's Bad Word Box. I told him that he could write as many bad notes as he wanted throughout each day as long as he put them in his special box. No one else in the classroom could put anything in it. The box was for him only as long as he put all the bad words that he wrote down in the box and nowhere else. If I found that he 9. _____ this rule and giving someone else a note with the bad words on it, the box was no longer his.

Mike filled the box daily with notes filled with angry messages and horrible language. Shortly thereafter, the number of notes in the bad word box 10.diminished. Slowly, they became fewer and fewer until there were no more bad words put into the box at all.
